

Dr Bronwyn Rossingh's experience working in remote Aboriginal communities in WA and the NT extends over 30 years having been Principal Researcher and Project Manager on many programs and research projects. She has extensive experience in developing programs and evaluative models and was assistant Chief Editor of Evaluation Journal of Australasia (EJA) for a number of years.

Dr Rossingh is committed to supervision, mentoring and supporting Indigenous research students. She currently works for Miwatj Health Aboriginal Corporation as Research Manager, and manages, coordinates and supports over 30 research projects.

She is responsible for forging strong relationships with research institutions across Australia and ensuring respectful pathways that align with the vision of Aboriginal community leaders. Her recent work has involved establishing culturally safe and respectful research governance and research practices. Bronwyn seeks to encourage and support Indigenous people to drive research and other projects to ensure that priorities and outcomes are based on their own vision, dreams and aspirations.
